Ortholf's Ariel Duck Traps. Chris Ortholf, the genial William street barber, whose ingenious mind keeps him busy when away from his keen-edged razors working upon some curious contrivance, and Peter Keller had a novel and thrilling experience while experimenting with a large balloon Tuesday afternoon. For some time Chris has been working upon a balloon designed to carry a small bask-et, in which he could sail over the meadows in duck season and from his aerial perch shoot the game as it passed over the high grass

Accompanied by James Taft, Peter Keller and Joe McNulty, Chris carried his aerial contrivance to a point on the river road near the Jersey City water works. The balloon was tied down to stakes driven in the earth, and, after being filled with hot air, gracefully rose to a distance of several feet above the ground, moving with an undulating motion in the strong breeze blowing across the river.

It was intended that the balloon should rise a certain height, and for this purpose a long rope had been attached to the basket with one end fastened to a tree. While Chris and Keller were holding the basket preparatory to attaching the basket preparatory to attaching the rope, a strong wind caught the balloon, causing the ropes holding it down to break. Before the men could loosen their hold upon the basket the balloon shot up through the air with lightning rapidity, carrying Chris and Keller with it. The former attempted to get into the basket in order to reach the into the basket in order to reach the check line and allow the air to escape, but the smallness of the wicker box and its swaying motion frustrated his efforts. The balloon rose to a distance of about thirty feet with the men clinging to the sides of the basket. It then moved out over the river and again began to rise gradually.

As the position of the men was becoming serious, their companions below became alarmed. Seeing that it was impossible for him to direct his air-ship, Chris called to Taft and McNulty to pierce the balloon with shots from the rifles which had been carried over by the men. Chris knowing that the unerring aim of both McNulty and Taft, who are excellent marksmen, made him secure from receiving a ording to size. charge from one of the rifles, decided 8.00 it was the best course to pursue. Keller, however, became alarmed when LANSBURGH&Bro., 15.00 the shots began to strike above his 35.00 head, and was about to take the risk of dropping fifty feet into the river than run the chances of being shot, when he was prevailed upon to retain his hold. In a short time the aim of the men below began to tell upon the balloon, and the perforations made in the side of the airship let out the air, causing it gradually to sink. When within twenty feet of the water a shot from one of the rifles struck one of Keller's fingers, and, becoming excited, he loosened his hold upon the basket and dropped into the river. The balloon was now sinking rapidly, and when the basket was within a few feet of the surface of the water Chris dropped into the river to aid Keller, who was struggling to keep afloat.

In the mean time the men upon the shore had manned a boat and were pulweek,-Belleville Press.
